Stardate 4523.7. While transporting a mystical orb to Bajor, the USS Defiant is thrown back in time when a passenger uses it to aid him in his plot to assassinate Captain James T. Kirk. Donning 23rd century uniforms, Sisko and his crew must infiltrate the original starship Enterprise in order to save him...

This is DS9's contribution to the 30th anniversary of Star Trek. Using "ground-breaking special effects", it was reported to be one million dollars over budget even before filming started! Action is intertwined with footage from the original episode "The Trouble With Tribbles" which first aired on NBC in 1967, during the second season of Star Trek, and is best remembered by fans for its light-hearted humour.

Charlie Brill returned to play the older instance of his character Arne Darwin, and the original model of the USS Enterprise NCC1701 was retrieved from the Smithsonian Museum to be used as a reference for a new (half-size) model.

47: Koloth's ship is a Class D-7 cruiser ('D' is the fourth letter of the alphabet). Dax repeats Spock's calculation that there would be 1,771,561 tribbles on the ship after three days; adding the digits of 1,771,561, you get 28, which is 4 * 7. Both of these references come from The Original Series episode "The Trouble with Tribbles", written over thirty years before the current generation of scriptwriters with their obsession for the number "47".

Meanwhile, in the Dominion prison camp, Worf is repeatedly forced to fight for his life, whilst the others try to devise an escape plan.

Continuation of the story from In Purgatory's Shadow.

Continuity wrinkle: In the prison camp, Bashir is wearing the old-style Starfleet uniform, suggesting he was captured before the events in Rapture on stardate 50378.9 (when the new uniforms reached Deep Space Nine).
